GIANT ICE SHELF BREAKS OFF IN ANTARCTICA

Penguins in their natural habitat in Antarctica.

Antarctica – The world has been obsessed with the trillion-ton piece of ice shelf that broke off in Antarctica a week ago.

The ice has been named A68 and consists of 12% of the Larsen C ice shelf. It is as big as Delaware, a state in the USA.

Some scientists have been calling the breaking off a natural occurrence, unrelated to global warming, while others argue that rising temperatures did actually indirectly cause the gargantuan piece of ice to break off.

This specific piece of ice will not cause sea levels to rise any further. However, the consequences of rising sea levels and climate change will eventually bring disaster to human kind and several species of animals.
